The Heathen Chinee.

The murder of a young white girl in one of New York's byways is only an dar, but it is not overstating the case to say that it has shocked the nation, not so much because of the evident brutality of the crime as from the fact that the murderer was a Chinaman who had won the confidence of his victim through his Constitutional Amendments.

One good result of the President's proposal for the adoption of an income tax amendment will be a practical test of the assumption, axiomatic in American politics, that the written Constitution is virtually unamendable. No amendment has been adopted for more than a century which was not the product of the stress and feeling of the civil war, and it has been often said that only some great wave of popular emotion would suffice to and indefinite. bring about further change in our organic instrument. Mr. Taft has just advised ever made a successful flight; indeed, an appeal to the country, or rather to the State legislatures, for an amendment affecting the taxing powers of the government, enlarging and more accurately ingloriously, so to speak. PLUTOCRAT AND POET.

Good old opulent John D.! He would look with scorn on me; I consider I'm in luck, when I have an extra buck; buying ice or buying coal always keeps me in the hole, and when I have paid the rent I am left without a cent. Yet I'm always gay and snug, happy as a tumblebug, having still the best of times, grinding out my blame fool rhymes! Old John D., on t'other hand, frets away to beat the band: he is burdened with his care—though he isn't with his hair-and his health is going back, and his liver's out of whack, and his conscience has grown numb, and his wishbone's out of plumb, and he's trembling all the day lest a plunk may get away. "Complex civilization and the curling iron are largely responsible for the tre mendous demand for hair restorers, continued Dr. Harris. "Our great-grandmothers didn't know anything about them, and they considered it a sort of disgrace to buy anything from a store, as they put it, with which to renew their hair, unless it was a little sweet-scented vegetable pomade, and they had beautiful hair, too, but it was all due, so they said, to constant, systematic, and prolonged

When grandmother's hair began to come out, she shook up some sage tea, stimulated her scalp with that, and considers it the best hair tonic in the world.

When that personal devil of womankind, the first gray hair, made its apnearance, she was terror stricken at first, after the fashion of her sex, but she soon realized that the time for renewed action had come, and so she gave her night and morning, after thoroughly wetting the scalp with a very strong solution of sage tea. This had a tendency to darken it, and when it, too, proved ineffectual and time began not only to make its presence felt, but to show itself in pepper-and-salt tresses, a little walnut juice was secretly applied, and this for a while at least, foiled time in
